Createspace, United States, 2015. Paperback. Book Condition: New. 229 x 152 mm. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .The author has a twofold object in view. He is impressed by the remarkable recrudescence of the millennial hope due to the War, and seeks to cut the ground beneath it by exposing the falsity of its underlying principle of interpretation of prophecy. His main purpose, however, is a larger one: to reopen the question of the attitude of the Protestant Churches towards the Scriptures as a principle of authority. He believes in the efficacy of the historical method and hopes to convert his readers by a study of the problem of predictive messianic prophecy as that is revealed in the history of biblical interpretation, leading up to the conclusion that the theory of predictive prophecy must be abandoned. Without attempting to quarrel with the matter of this work, we venture to take exception to its form. An author must consider his public to a certain extent if he wishes his book to be read. Here we have a work which is at once too technical and tedious for the average reader and inadequate for the scholar. Thorough-going Millennialists will scarcely be attracted to the perusal of some hundred pages illustrative of the Patristic argument from prophecy with quotations from Justin Martyr and the Apologists in order to satisfy themselves that their own cherished beliefs must be abandoned. Nor again are those attracted by the Millennial Hope likely to engage in so elaborate an historical study in order to inoculate themselves against the heresy. If the main purpose of the work, however, is to demonstrate that Protestantism must come to terms with itself as to its own principium and frankly adopt the results of modern biblical scholarship, then...
